

Isabelle Freggi, "Colonial Board game turns the French Colonies into Child's Play,"

<https://doi.org/10.1017/9781009051111.004>

"Blinded as France at the outbreak of World War II, the game 'Des des échanges' (the trading game) sought to educate children about the colonial world supporting the French economy. With colonies presented as vast stores of resources players had to send resources to regions colonized by the French, from French Africa to Indochina. The underlying purpose of the game was to educate, through play, the generations of the French colonial undertaking. The colonization of a land was symbolically achieved first by hoisting the French flag on its soil, then by the establishment of a hospital, a school, and ultimately a harbor. But the ultimate role was to export the rich natural resources of the colonies back to France by boat."

Isabelle Freggi, "Des des échanges," 1960

4. A cultural historian could infer that "The Trading Game" reflected the French desire to teach children:
- The social differences between Europeans and non-white Africans and Asians
 - The political importance of French nationals in
 - The cultural duty to "civilize" and bring benefits of French industrialization to colonies
 - The economic imperative for France to get resources for their growing economy
